

Impact Medium · Difficulty Easy · Misuse risk Low

THE MOVE

Name who contributed -> Name what they did -> Do not be vague

START HERE

The next time you present work that involved others, name at least one contributor specifically before you present it.

SAY THIS

|-------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Shared Credit Phrases   | "[Name] built the core of this — I want to make sure that is visible."                                        |
| Credit Framing          | "Before I present this — let me name who is actually behind it."                                              |
| Credit to Their Face    | "You made this project better than I could have alone — the model especially."                                |
| Redirecting Credit      | "Thank you — and to be accurate, that insight was Maya's, not mine."                                          |
| Repairing Missed Credit | "I presented your work yesterday without naming you. That was wrong, and I have corrected it with the group." |

AVOID

- When your individual contribution needs to be visible for legitimate reasons — e.g. a performance review where your specific work must be legible.
- When sharing credit for something that went wrong — ownership of failure is different from shared credit for success.
- When attributing credit to someone who did not contribute confuses accountability.

REMEMBER

Credit given in the big room counts double; credit given vaguely counts for nothing.
