Make them the expert

What to do

Core move: name their real vantage point, then ask one narrow question that lets them teach from it.

Minimum viable phrase: You know this better than I do - what should I notice first?

Best cue: they have real experience, proximity, taste, context, or pattern recognition.

How to land it

Formula: You have [real basis]. What [small question] should I notice/check/understand first?

Calibration: continue if they add nuance; narrow or stop if they look burdened.

Recovery: I may have put you on the spot. You do not have to answer that.

Ask small. Listen fully. Credit the useful distinction. Keep responsibility for your own choice.

Use it without extracting

What to do

Use when: their distinct expertise is the useful centre of the moment.

Avoid when: the topic is private, identity-loaded, time-consuming, or would make them responsible for your decision.

Credit loop: That helps - I had not separated those two issues.

How to land it

Neighbour distinction: similarity signalling says "we are alike"; this says "you have a useful read I should learn from."

Do not say: You are the genius here, tell me what to do.

Do say: You have been closer to this. What would you check first?
